Addressing World Hunger

Q & A with Gaddi Vasquez, U.S. ambassador and former Peace Corps director

By GAIL MATSUNAGA  gmatsunaga@fullerton.edu

ROM THE streets of Orange to ancient roads leading to Rome, Gaddi Vasquez has seen many parts of the world — most recently as the eighth U.S. representative to the United Nations Food and Agriculture Agencies in Rome.

Vasquez returns to Orange County as the inaugural keynote speaker for Cal State Fullerton’s international conference, “Connecting Worlds,” taking place April 17 and 18 as part of the university’s 50th anniversary celebration.

From his Rome base, Vasquez addressed some questions about world hunger, his experiences as director of the Peace Corps and how today’s students can make a difference.

What is your main role as ambassador?

“I lead the mission staff in drawing attention to global problems of hunger and food insecurity, and in managing and ensuring the effective use of U.S. resources provided to the United Nations for the benefit of the poor, hungry and marginalized.”

What do you bring to your position?

“During my tenure in the Peace Corps, I had the opportunity to visit more than 60 countries and manage a large international organization. I met with heads of state and senior officials of governments throughout the world and worked to advance an understanding of the Peace Corps and the great work of its volunteers. The nature of my work entailed diplomacy and understanding the challenges, needs and opportunities in countries where the Peace Corps works. I believe that experience gave me the opportunity to develop some of the skills that are essential in my current position. On a very personal level, I have a deep passion for the work that I am involved in now. The challenges can be daunting and overwhelming at times. But saving lives and giving hope to those in need is work I believe in and have been committed to for more than 20 years.”

What is the biggest challenge for this country as it relates to world hunger?

“The sheer magnitude of the hunger challenge is daunting. It’s tragic that one child dies every five seconds from hunger in our world. Perhaps our biggest challenge is, in the face of the hunger challenge, becoming discouraged with our progress or focusing on our own domestic problems. My experience has taught me that we need to treat this issue with a sense of urgency.”

What skills/areas of study do you think will be most valuable in meeting the challenges of the future and make the greatest impact?

“It’s very important for Americans to gain international experience. The Peace Corps is a wonderful opportunity to volunteer and contribute to improving the lives of the least fortunate in our world. Direct experience with the daily struggles of men, women and children in developing countries is very valuable to any young American who wishes to make a strong contribution to ending hunger. University study programs that include agricultural science, economics, international development, political science, history and foreign languages give students a solid academic grounding, but the course of study matters less than a passion for international service, for reaching out beyond our borders to lend a helping hand to those struggling to live day to day.”

Gaddi At A Glance

Age: 53
Main residence: Orange
Family: Married to Elaine; son, Jason
Career Highlights: Peace Corps director; Southern California Edison division vice president; Orange County Supervisor; chief deputy appointments secretary to former Gov. George Deukmejian; city of Orange police officer; various appointments to state boards and commissions by Deukmejian and former governors Pete Wilson and Gray Davis; and appointments to federal commissions by former President George H. W. Bush.
Hobbies: Reading, traveling, cycling
Philosophy on life: “Tests of life are sent to make us, not to break us.”
Role models: “George Deukmejian. I admire him because he never lost sight of the trust that the people of California placed in him during his two terms as governor and other statewide constitutional offices. He devoted his life to public service. My father served as a lifelong role model who taught me the importance of servant-leadership. He always believed that developing a servant’s heart was important in the life of a leader. He believed in a strong work ethic and a philosophy that you worked hard every day so you had a job the next day. He was a man of deep faith whose optimism and love of people knew no boundaries. He never sought recognition or public acclaim. He lived to serve others.”

International Conference Set for April 17-18

Cal State Fullerton will welcome ambassadors and representatives from around the globe during “Connecting Worlds,” a two-day international conference April 17 and 18 in the Titan Student Union. Open to the public, the conference is part of the university’s 50th anniversary celebration.

The first day’s sessions will address world hunger, health and the aging population. Gaddi Vasquez, eighth U.S. representative to the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organizations, will provide the keynote address, followed by a panel discussion with ambassadors from South Africa and South Korea.

Economic development and global education will be the topics of discussion April 18, with keynote speakers Wang Shenghong, president of Fudan University in China, and Werner Zeigler, rector of Nürtingen-Geislingen University in Germany. Also scheduled are panel discussions with ambassadors from China, India, Egypt and Brazil, plus businessmen from Russia and Orange County.

“Connecting Worlds” is free for students and $50 for others. For more information and to register for the event, visit: http://www.fullerton.edu/50thconference.
